CHANGEMAKERS MASTER OF STUDIES IN LAW

Adding Depth

Katie Mulvaney

Seasoned newspaper reporter Katie Mulvaney decided to take her legal-beat knowledge to the next level by entering RWU Law's Master of Studies in Law (MSL) program. Here, Mulvaney talks about her decision:

I have had the good fortune of covering the courts in Rhode Island for The Providence Journal since 2009. I relish the beat for both its emotional and legal elements. It keeps me engaged and learning every day, and it allows me to explore what makes people tick, for good and for bad.

However, it did not take me long to realize, after enrolling in the Master of Studies in Law program at Roger Williams University School of Law last term, that, up to that point, I did not know how much I did not know about the law, though I had written about it for years.

Suddenly, when embattled Rhode Island District Court Judge Rafael Ovalles sued a Channel 10 reporter for defamation, New York Times v. Sullivan came to mind. I also learned the elements of conspiracy and accomplice liability. And I finally understood what common law really was.

As the jury deliberated in Dan Doyle's trial for embezzling from his non-profit, the Institute for International Sport, I found myself contemplating the mens rea of the offenses with which he was charged. I even tried to explain actus reus and mens rea to a fellow reporter. He did not bite.

"The MSL program is adding depth to my reporting and my understanding of the law. The courses are a challenge, but MSL students get to suffer through with law school students working side by side. We work hard. Very hard."

One of the things that struck me most about the program, and something that seems to set the law school apart, took place during orientation in August. The professors and administration placed a particular emphasis on diversity of thought, mind, race, religion, and sexual orientation. I found that sense of inclusion permeated discussion in class and the culture of the law school. It has impressed me. I am thankful for this opportunity.
